ADMISSION FREE.

The Art Gallery Committee desire to express thanks to Mr. D. S. MacColl for his permission to use his introductory article upon Alphonse Legros.

All the works in the Exhibition have been kindly lent by the family of the late Mr. Legros, through the Fine Art Society (except where otherwise stated), and the Committee take this opportunity to express their hearty thanks for this valuable loan.

Some of the pictures, drawings, etchings, and sculpture, are for sale, and enquiries as to these should be addressed to Mr. Stanfield, the Curator.

INTRODUCTION.

ALPHONSE LEGROS, born at Dijon 8th May, 1837, came to London in 1863, where he lived and worked till 1903, with intervals spent in a cottage at Brasted Chart in Kent (1899-1905); he then moved to Watford, where he died on December 8th, 1911. Much of his English life was spent in teaching, first in the class of etching at South Kensington, afterwards as assistant and successor to Sir Edward Poynter at the Slade School, University College; his Professorship lasted from 1876 till 1892.

Several special exhibitions of his work were held during his life-time, notably at van Wisselingh's Dutch Gallery, where the last was in 1906, at the Luxembourg in 1900, and at Keppel's New York Gallery about 1892. The collection now on view embraces only those works which remained in his hands or those of his family at his death; they date, with some exceptions, from the years that followed his retirement. Etchings, except for some prints taken up and worked upon, form a separate exhibition at Messrs. Gutekunst's, and it may be hoped that at the Tate Gallery or elsewhere a retrospective exhibition of paintings and other work will be organised. The total would have been much greater but for Legros' fastidious taste, which drove him in later years to destroy a great deal of his work. Part had to be saved by stealth from this ruthless sifting. First comes a very interesting set of portrait drawings of his own family on a scale well chosen for pencil drawing. The small baby heads (No. 40) date from 1868, the drawings of his little girl, Marie (No. 78) from 1870 and 1877, that of his wife (No. 83) from 1872, the little boy from 1874, the brother-in-law, Mr. Hodgson (No. 53), from 1873. A much later group in silver point was the délassement of Sundays at Brasted, when little models were hunted up for him in the village and tempted into his studio. They might be called "Les Petits aux fondants," for after experiment Legros found that those sweetmeats were the best to keep his sitters quiet without too much disturbance of their features.

Then there are figure pieces and landscapes drawn in sepia or worked over etching. These belong to the constant lines on which his invention brooded and wrought. Legros, a man not intellectually religious, not in his tastes Bohemian, by his admiration and occasional practice a lover of classic and idyllic art, was imaginatively haunted first and last by the life of priests in the oratory, humble women about a shrine, tramps by the way-side, peasants burdened by toil, bowed under the menace of storm, or caught in the traps of death. Notable designs among those here are "Un Accident" (No. 67), whose large plain rhythm might have been expanded for a mural decoration, "Après le Crime" (Nos. 38 and 45), in which all the essentials of the idea are present. I speak of one or two among many things that in the hurry of arrangement it has been impossible to linger over.

More than one canvas belongs to the group of his "souvenirs," or dreams of landscape. A figure (No. 17) surviving out of four in a picture of kneeling women is an example of the salvage I have referred to. Two other canvases (Nos. 33 & 121), illustrate Legros' rapid demonstrations with the brush before students, most of them now in public collections.

In sculpture he made a number of essays, from the Millet-like figure of the "Boulogne Fishewoman" (No. 302), to the classic "Torso" (No. 300). He sent in many years ago, to a Scottish competition, a figure of William Wallace, but was unsuccessful, and the figure was probably destroyed. Design for medals he first took up in 1881, the "Carlyle" (No. 6), and "Darwin" (No. 2) in frame No. 296, among the earliest; on some of them, it may be noted, to save the learned from maddening research, he put fanciful names, whose sound and lettering pleased him. About 1897, at the instance of Mr. Arthur Strong, the Duke of Portland commissioned him to design fountains for Welbeck; these were carried out with the help of Professor Lanteri. A pencil drawing here shows the amplitude and grace of the treatment, and several full-size drawings for detail are also shown. With these will be found some sketches for the decoration of the Bank of England at the Jubilee of 1897. A drawing of nymphs for a ceiling at Welbeck (No. 41), never carried out, shows Legros casting back to a France earlier than Millet and the Revolutions. What he might have done on this scale in the full tide of his powers we can only conjecture.
